ARMENDARIS RANCH BISON

History of Area Closely Tied To History of Armendaris Grant

The history of this area is closely tied to the history of the Pedro Armendaris Grant. Indeed, they cannot be separated.

A look at modern maps of the local area show the boundaries of Pedro Armendaris Grant No. 33 adjacent to the city limits of Truth or Consequences. In fact, if ancient claims are recognized, the city itself would lie within the grant boundaries.

As it is, the Pedro Armendaris Grant stretches for miles on both sides of the Rio Grande, and has been the source of many a legal battle among the heirs of Pedro Armendaris as well as among those who wished to take parts of it over, legally or otherwise.

The U.S. government has been very prominent in this regard, and very much so during the middle of the 19th century when huge areas around Fort McRae and Fort Craig, for example, were carved out as military reservations from the original grant area. The reservation areas are still shown on modern maps.

The Fort Craig Reservation area, for example, covers a little more than 38 square miles.

Pedro Armendaris was an officer in the service of the Spanish Crown who performed a service to his Majesty the King of Spain by clearing the area of Apaches in the early 1800s (only very temporarily, as it turned out, because many others later spent a considerable amount of time and trouble in doing the same thing.)

Ill health forced him to resign his commission, and for his services he was rewarded with a private land grant in accordance with old Spanish custom. Don Pedro took up residence in the area near where Fort Craig later stood. Having apparently renewed his health and vigor, he successfully petitioned the Crown for still more land known as the Bosque de Apache, promising to clear it of Apaches and to colonize it for Spain. Thus he was granted a vast domain of land on both sides of the Rio Grande.

He was somewhat delayed in this purpose by the Apaches, who did not recognize the "legality" of even the existence of his grant, and drove him out for a time. But being a soldier with the tenacity of his Spanish heritage, he returned and built a hostel, hotel, an eating place and a stage stop along the Chihuahua-Santa Fe Trail, and started a settlement at Valverde and at San Marcial, known then as La Mesa.

Floods on the Rio Grande changed the locale of these settlements later.

When the United States and Mexico went to war in the 1840s, Don Pedro thought it prudent to take his family south of the border, to Chihuahua. Before he left, however, he looked up an American, a lawyer in Santa Fe, and they both promised to protect his interests while he was away, in return for some choice land.

This was bound to complicate matters in itself, but the old established custom followed all over the world of heirs fighting among themselves also arose to confuse the situation further when old Don Pedro died "in exile". The trouble within the family came when Jose R. Garcia, who had married Don Pedro's only daughter, Belen, represented himself as the sole heir. This disturbed Don Pedro's eldest son Manuel, who firmly believed in the old Spanish custom of the oldest son receiving all, and the daughters not to mention a daughter's husband - nothing in such matters. Actually, Belen also was unhappy to find that Jose had not married her only for love, but also land.

All of this came to a head when the United States Government decided, in 1854, to build Fort Craig on grant land without asking permission. Jose had a lawyer check into why the government had done this, but his efforts to get them off the land failed, especially since the fort already was occupied by American soldiers. So a compromise was reached which seemed very fair to the government - they contracted to pay a rental of $1 a year for five years on a renewable basis. This might have soothed his wife's feelings a little - Jose apparently was not being so money mad after all - but it didn't fool Manuel, who figured that Jose was trying to legalize his claim through the contract with the U.S. government.

So the U. S. government, being impartial, drew up another agreement with Manuel in 1858, to last for 10 years. The other sections of the agreement were all the same - he could sell any part of the area outside the fort area and cultivate land to within three miles of the fort itself.

There also was one added advantage - Manuel got an "exclusive" deal to provide all the wood for fuel that the soldiers at Fort Craig would wish to purchase. Not only that, but he also was to have free use of the government ferry boat in delivering the wood when the river was unfordable.

Later, when Jose left the scene in favor of his oldest son, Rodrigo, the two branches of the family apparently got together enough to be recognized as co-heirs, and a third lease was signed for five years by Manuel Armendaris and Rodrigo Garcia.

Lest one get the idea that it was thus cleared up and that land changed hands legally and happily every after, it is necessary to be reminded that there were two gentlemen, a lawyer and a trader, who had claimed choice land in exchange for protecting Don Pedro's claim. These two men later attempted to set up a stock farm on the land obtained from Pedro Armendaris.

During the Civil War, the government thought it best to extend the fort reservation area and considerable negotiations ensued on the rental of the land obtained from Pedro Armendaris.

When the Confederates invaded the area, the situation was further complicated. Add to this the fact that some men, honorably discharged after the war and who were members of the California Volunteers, settled in the area and held claims on grant land as compensation - further clouding the picture.

Since that time, of course, the area has become part of the state of New Mexico, Elephant Butte Dam and reservoir have been built in the area by the U. S. government, and state parks, ranches

Once Thriving Cutter Vanishes from Sight

Cutter, the name on a sign post erected on a wind swept prairie, mesquite and tumbleweeds on the Jornada del Muerto (Journey of Death) amid a ghostly silence echoing sounds of a turbulent past, is all that remains of a once-thriving community serving as a railhead for shipping ore from mines in the Caballo Mountains. Cutter, located 17 miles south, southeast of TorC is devoid of any ruins of a once-populated settlement of an estimated 3,000 to 3,500 people.

During the late 1890's and early 1900's mining reached a productive peak in the Caballos, necessitating a shipping point on the Santa Fe Railroad running between El Paso to the south and Albuquerque to the north. Lead, vanadium and copper mines were being worked.

The mining activity brought families into the area and a community sprang into existence. The Victoria Chief Mining Company constructed a mill in Cutter to prepare the ore for shipment and employed about 300 men to run the operation. Several hundred other men were employed in the mines. The company brought mules from and housing developments among other things dot the grant area. But in the midst of it all, the name of Pedro Armendaris lives on and cannot be ignored.

The Armendaris Land Development Corp. - with offices in Kansas City and Sheridan, Wyoming continues to own great areas of land in the West - including land in the local region and to operate various enterprises through subsidiaries and leasing arrangements.

Missouri to use for the wagon teams hauling the ore out of the mines, according to Dudley Lyons, a former resident of the city. Dudley went to work for the company as a young boy and drove a team to and from the mines. Dudley is the son of the late Andy and Mary Lyons.

The Victoria Chief built a two-story brick hotel which had the latest in accommodations. Guests were provided with private baths and all the comforts that were available to a hotel of that day. The hotel building also housed a First National Bank, store, restaurant and post office.

Other businesses included a lumber yard, livery stable and for the relaxation of the miners and cowboys, and to the disdain of their wives, there were five saloons during the mining boom. Sources do not reveal there ever having been a church.

A brick schoolhouse was built by the Victoria Chief Mining Company to provide education for the youngsters of the area. The one-room structure was staffed with one teacher who taught grades one through eight. Mrs. Hirman Yost was the first teacher, a position she held for three years before going to the college in Las Cruces where she taught for 40 years.

W. H. Weston, a mining engineer from the East, arrived in Cutter to serve as manager of the Victoria Mining Company. He filed on some land which became known as Weston Hill, the only hill in Cutter and located west of the railroad tracks.

Lee McLenond owned a livery stable and was kept busy during the construction of Elephant Butte Dam. He also established a ranch located west of Weston's Hill which in later years was purchased by Neil Graham.

Mr. And Mrs. Andy Lyons operated the toll road in Palomas Gap for a time before moving to Cutter where Mrs. Lyons went into the store business and eventually became postmistress of the post office. Andy later filed on a ranch in the foothills of east side of the Caballos which he operated for a number of years.

Although the mining boom was responsible for the existence of Cutter, open range and homesteading prevailed and settlers filed on land and established ranches which outlined the flourish of mining activity. Mr. and Mrs. Charlie Graham were among the first to arrive in the area and built up one of the largest ranches in the immediate area of Cutter. According to sources, they came to Cutter in 1896. The ranch is located on the west side of the railroad and was later known as the L7 ranch.

The mining boom was short lived and when the mines finally closed down, the settlement virtually died. The homesteaders and ranchers stayed on, the school continued to exist and the post office had daily mail service. Maintenance crews for the Santa Fe were housed in a cement block-constructed bunkhouse and the section foreman resided in a frame house painted with the Santa Fe railroad colors of yellow and green. The hotel continued to be the center of social activity and one saloon was now adequate to quench the thirst of the local cowboys.

George Curry, ex-territorial governor of New Mexico and a member of Teddy Roosevelt's Rough Riders, and his wife Martha came to Cutter in 1915 and operated the old Victoria Hotel for two years before leaving the area. He returned in 1920 and took up residence on the Dan McCauley ranch located one mile north of the Lyons Grocery Store and post office.

Mr. and Mrs. Bill Norton, later leased the ranch and lived there until the ranch was sold in 1937 to Mr. and Mrs. E. R. Wash and family.

The late Mr. and Mrs. Nate Smith resided in Cutter with their family from about 1914 to 1927 when they moved to this city. Other ranchers or homesteaders in the area during those early years included Seddie Renick, Dugan Sowell, Harry Gore, John Latham, Bruce Miller, Watt Gilmore, Hirman Yost, Bill Mears, Pink Davis and Heffernan family, among others.

By the late 30's and early 40's, the school had been closed and later torn down for building materials and the Victoria Hotel had been torn down for a number of years. With the outbreak of World War II, ranchers were shipping large numbers of cattle with beef prices high. During this time, those residing in Cutter were the Grahams, Sowell, Lyons, Walshs, McLenond, Roy Renicks and those employed by the Santa Fe section crews.

Mrs. Lyons retired from the post office in 1943 and the old store building and post office were torn down. Walsh became postmaster and the office was moved to a one-room frame structure. Youngsters in the area were attending school seven miles away in Engle. Mr. Roy Renick was bus driver.

Santa Fe changed to a modern day diesel engines and the trains no longer stopped to water up or unload cinders. In time, the section crews were abolished and the bunkhouse and foreman's house became vacant. Old timers had left the Jornada and moved to town and finally on June 15, 1956 the post office at Cutter was closed. The office had been serving only six families, who made up the entire population of Cutter; they started receiving their mail from the Engle star route carrier.

By the late 50's and through the 60's Cutter's population dwindled to only a couple of ranchers. Mr. and Mrs. Ben Cain and family resided five miles south of Cutter on the Aleman Ranch.

So, as jets from Holloman Air Force Base streak across the skies of the Jornada and the Santa Fe train travels along the flat, little note is taken of Cutter and old father time has left a very few who remember it in its hey day. A number of us remember it in later years with memories of a childhood spent on a wind-blown flat.

(Editor's Note: This feature was written, not for historical data, but for the fact that Cutter did exist. The writer's family lived in Cutter from 1937 to 1958).
